I bought this book hoping it would help me plan a trip to France with my 10 month old---it really helped me with nothing. A lot of common sense "tips" (be sure to always have snacks on hand! bring enough formula/baby food for the flight and a possible delay!), yet I could not find information on car seats, high chairs, outlet covers in hotel rooms, etc. Don't waste your money on this book.

Out of 3 books i bought on how to travel with a baby. This one was the least helpful off the 3. It lacked any real information on equipment and packing etc. I found a relatively new book 'Traveling with a baby' to be a bit more informative.

Planning a Family Vacation
Whether traveling with babies and young children is exhilarating or exhausting, thrilling or terrifying depends in large part on your attitude -- and your preparation is mental; You need to refine your expectations so that you don't envision something that could never come to pass. A handful of tried-and-true good parenting techniques are just as important on the road as they are at home. Finally, you need to choose a destination that works for you as a family, with something for everyone to enjoy. Zeroing in on the perfect spot and setting all the plans in motion is the first challenge for a family traveler. The changing mindscape is a challenge when it comes to planning trips for a family. But in a way, traveling with youngsters is a little like traveling with anyone else: You have to consider your companions' interests as well as your own. Practically speaking, that means picking a destination that can be appreciated at many different levels, one where your toddler can get excited about, say, the museum's colorful floor tiles, the ants along the trail, or the restaurant's novel bathrooms while you admire the exhibits, the woodlands' grandeur, or the view over the harbor from your table. You also want a destination with at least one attraction that will be really special to at least one member of the family -- yourself included. Whatever your choice, make sure that the places you choose to stay do welcome families so you don't feel as if you have to apologize for your children when they're just acting their age.
